uring segregation, the first movie theater for African-American patrons was located at the northwest corner of Queen and Henry streets. In the fall of 1920, despite protests, Harry Bramow was issued a permit to enlarge an existing structure at 1101 Queen Street for use as a theater for "moving pictures." The Lincoln Theater opened soon after and in the spring of 1921 featured the silent film "Symbol of the Unconquered," written, directed and produced by Oscar Micheaux in response to "Birth of a Nation."

Around 1930, Abe Lichtman took over the theater, one of several he owned in the

The Capitol became a pool hall and amusement center around 1950, about the same time this photo of a parade was taken. The pool hall remained open through the 1960s, and in the 1970s, it became home to Sykes Warehouse, an automotive parts business. New owners completed renovation of it in 2008 and today the property is used for offices and retail space.

"Out of the Attic" is published each week in the Alexandria Times newspaper. The column began in September 2007 as "Marking Time" and explored Alexandria's history through collection items, historical images and architectural representations. Within the first year, it evolved into "Out of the Attic" and featured historical photographs of Alexandria.
