3. How will you contribute to making the civic engagement initiative successful?

I will participate in person and online, and encourage others in our community to become informed, share their opinions, and help provide feedback.

4. List three things that will demonstrate this process is different than the past:

1. : Establishment of a process so that citizens can understand the steps that will be taken and can engage throughout decisionmaking.
2. : Communication by decisionmakers that informs and educates about alternatives considered.
3. : Participation levels and quality increase.

5. 1.

Increased participation levels and quality of participaiton.

6. 2.

New forms of documentation that provide a record of our engagement process for each project.

7. List ways in which City government can be held accountable.

Documentation of alternatives considered and reasoning/justification for the options ultimately chosen.

8. List ways in which community members can be held accountable.

When clearly communicated to participants, participation could be made part of the public record. Also, rules for participation could be created so that engagement is constructive and respectful.

4. List three things that will demonstrate this process is different than the past:

1. : New faces at meetings and events!
2. : Less negative discourse in local papers and online (is that possible??)
3. : More options, like livestream, polling, etc. for participation in meetings and decisions

5. 1.

Poll results (?) on civic satisfaction of the City's decision-making process

6. 2.

Diversity of citizens (neighborhood, age, length of living in the City, race, owner/renter, etc.) thoughtfully participating and engaged (challenge: setting the baseline for today)

7. List ways in which City government can be held accountable.

producing a scorecard and then reporting on it; City Council and Manager keeping these principles in the forefront of each 'public process';

3. How will you contribute to making the civic engagement initiative successful?

4. List three things that will demonstrate this process is different than the past:

1. : A sustained effort to solicit feedback from participants.
2. : Improved diversity--in cultural background, but more importantly in age, neighborhood representation, income levels, and in expertise
3. : an effort to host meetings at new times (and possibly venues) to capture a different cross section of the civic population

5. 1.

Though I don't pretend to know how we can capture this (other than feedback), I think that one way to measure success is the sense of ownership citizens feel for the quality of life in their community. Do they feel totally distanced from city life? Do they fear engagement? Are they confused my city processes and how to voice concerns or requests?

6. 2.

Transparency in stating the objectives of civic engagements, and the steps being taken to achieve those same objectives. This one again will probably rely on feedback, but we need to ensure people feel that there are no closed-door discussions about what's going on, what is being planned, who is involved, etc. I applaud the city for its efforts to get the word out via social media (in fact that is how I learned about tonight's live event!) and make the city transparent in that regard.

7. List ways in which City government can be held accountable.

In diversifying means of communication and engagement with the community. For example, hosting events using web-based tools, varying the times of events (morning/evenings; weeknights/weekends) and providing some kind of record of the feedback citizens give. The feedback is critical because folks should feel that their comments are being recorded--and therefore will require a response or at least are there as a measure of success/failure for the city to take action on the comments of its community. Either an online forum or record that people can submit and return to would be great.

8. List ways in which community members can be held accountable.

When members come up with questions or ideas, ask them to take the lead in researching or putting together an event. The goal is to not just have more people 'present' but to have people willing to take action. Community members should be held accountable also, and we can do so by documenting participation levels, and having folks follow through with feedback when the city responds to their requests or concerns.

3. How will you contribute to making the civic engagement initiative successful?

I'm still a bit unclear the best way to help contribute other than to be vocal to my fellow citizens that this initiative is happening and volunteer my time to help with whatever is asked.

4. List three things that will demonstrate this process is different than the past:

1. : It becomes common knowledge amongst all the community that the city is pursuing a community engagement strategy.
2. : Last minute roadblocks (e.g. sudden community outrage) to initiatives and projects are eliminated.
3. : Objectives for community projects are clear at the outset and when a project completes, an effort to assess how well the project performed occurs.

5. 1.

The first is the most measurable. These are evaluations of how well projects perform in meeting their intended objectives. The thought here being that an involved community will help shape the objectives to meet exactly the needs of the community and ensure the outcomes meet those objectives.

6. 2.

Though less measurable, if high numbers of citizens understand what initiatives are taking place in Alexandria, and even better what the issues therein are, then community engagement is sufficient. People who want to be actively involved will be, but the community at large should be knowledgeable/informed regardless.

7. List ways in which City government can be held accountable.

8. List ways in which community members can be held accountable.
